The original line-up in the men's group was: Charles Smith, John Wheeler, Robert Coxon, Charles Afferbach, Hugh B. Webster, Richard Hopkins, Harold H. Haefner and Richard Dunlap. During the past several days some matches have been played, with the result that Wheeler has defeated Coxon; Afferbach has won over Coxon; and Wheeler has won over Smith. In the women's section the list originally read: Dorothy Dicken, Grace H. Hilck, Elma E. Haefner, Amy Afferbach, Elizabeth Foster, and Adeline E. Reetz. Miss Reetz has displaced Miss Foster for fifth position; Miss Hilck after a match with Miss Dicken gains first position; and positions of Miss Haefner and Mrs. Afferbach remain the same after a playoff.

Members of the Epworth Tennis Club, here, whose names were drawn for place a week ago, are now playing for position. SAYING ALL THINGS

Mr. Dooley once discussed the matter of carrying on a correspondence in Chinese. According to the Sage of Archey Road, a letter in the Orient may be read from right to left, and vice versa, and then from top to bottom and bottom to top, each conveying a different meaning. It may then be held before a mirror, and finally it may be chopped up fine and boiled with rice. The resultant paste is spread thin on a slab and, when dry, reveals a sixth message, after which the recipient is entitled to eat his letter.

Such are the sayings of that occidental sage, Calvin Coolidge, judging from the varying interpretations of them. His word, like the Scriptures, may be quoted to one's own purpose.

It will be remembered that those immortal words uttered at Rapid City three years ago were interpreted to mean that their author would not run for reelection, that he would run for reelection, that he was running for reelection, that he would like to run for reelection, that he was waiting to be asked to run for reelection and that he was either running for something or away from something. His fate seems to have pursued the gentleman into the semi-public sphere he now occupies as a commentator on the state of the union. On one day an editor takes a line from a Coolidge homily to prove that the former president is against Mr. Hoover and the tariff, and the next day another editor quotes the line to show that Cal is Herbert's loyal press-agent. Evidently, any unsuspected and startling meaning can emerge from the apparently innocent routine of ex-presidential thought.

STIRRING THE BEANS

Cables to all parts of the world were crowded with rumors and theories and all Europe buzzed excitedly when Premier Mussolini was quoted as favoring the return of the Hapsburgs to the Hungarian throne in the person of Archduke Otto. The report inspired a vast amount of speculation about Italian intrigues in Central Europe, an alliance between Italy and the Little Entente against France, and similar possibilities.

The idea of Italy backing a Hapsburg for anything profitable to that family is historically ludicrous, but that didn't prevent Europeans swallowing the yarn. For centuries the Italians have hated the Hapsburg line, under whose sway large parts of Italy suffered until forced to revolt. Italy will never forgive nor forget those years of cruel subjugation. But there is another obstacle to Hapsburg restoration. Hungary is under a pledge to the League of Nations never to restore her old ruling family to power without the consent of Italy, France, Great Britain, Belgium and the Little Entente nations. Moreover, Hungary doesn't want the Hapsburgs back.

All of which means Il Duce was hunting headlines, or emulating Lord Palmerston, who had a gift for stimulating the imagination by making equivocal statements that meant nothing but were interpreted into the most startling pronouncements.

SYNOPSIS

Fair-skinned Dawn, mystery girl, is about to be burned alive by the African black tribe. She has failed, as the mystic wife of the black god Malungu, to divert the drought and bring rain. She is really a white girl. Tom Allen, her sweetheart, shipped to England by a ruse of a rival, Shep Keyes, has returned. Shep, whip-man, has incited the natives to burn Dawn. Double-crossing, he comes to her, and tells her that, at the price of her running off with him to the jungles, he will aid her escape. Tom informs the British commandant of Dawn's white birth: he gets permission to visit Mombassa to get verifying facts.

INSTALLMENT THIRTY-TWO

"Well," he finally said, "either he's got to stop his visits or I shall. I do not like ghosts. Indeed, they can't even grow upon me. After all, Moodsa, this is the twentieth century and—"

His words were arrested by a shrill shriek from Moodsa. Looking up at her, he beheld her staring in terror at a shabby old man who had entered. The black woman seemed unable to take her eyes off him. She suddenly collapsed in hysteria, sank into a chair opposite the unhappy Duke and began to moan as if in pain.

Meantime the old man who had occasioned all the excitement remained oblivious to it. Ignored by the waiter, he sat silent at the table, peering about as if expecting somebody. To Duke he seemed harmless enough, and also very much alive, not the least ghost-like. He fancied either Moodsa's mind had become unbalanced through a too whole-hearted belief in some pagan godhead, or more likely, she was suffering the after effects of over-indulgence in Gene Lee's noxious liquor.

Under his urgings that she pull herself together, Moodsa gradually quieted her sobs. She cast one apprehensive glance at the harmless-looking man. In answer to Duke's inquiring glance she confided that he was the ghost.

"Every day he comes," she added in a frightened whisper. "His fears dissipated by the sight of the weakling who so terrified Moodsa, Duke, despite the tragedy of the broken monochrome, recovered some of his airy composure. His admonitions to Moodsa to forget her fears actually began to sound convincing to himself. Several morsels of his porter, which acquires unsuspected potency under the tropical sun, not only conquered his uneasiness, but also bred in him a suspicion that it would advantage him to find out the real reason for Moodsa's demonstrative fear.

He had not long to wait. The forlorn little man rose silently, and walked slowly toward the black woman, who cringed with screams of horror before his accusing eyes. "There he is! He always finds me," she called wildly. "Throw the beggar out! Throw him out!" She covered her face with her hands.

Without a word the man advanced. Duke rose to restrain him, but somehow was powerless to do so. The man seized Moodsa's hands and tore them from her face. He peered intently into her eyes and seemed satisfied with what he found there.

"Your eyes," he muttered in a voice of bewilderment, "they black."

"Get away!" shrieked Moodsa. "Get away, you ghost!" Without a word the man turned and walked out of the room. Again Duke was forced to calm the fear-maddened woman. But this time he did it with less distaste than before. He suspected that she was on the point of a significant confession.

"Now that I think of it," he observed with exaggerated casualness, "it seems to me I've heard of this ghost along the water front."

Quickly Moodsa uplifted her head. "Yes," she said, her voice still quivering with fright, "every place I go since he came. He follow me from place to place. Now he come here."

"I see," commented Duke. "Why is he looking for you?"

Frenziedly Moodsa seized the Englishman's arm in her denial that his guest was for her.

"No, no, no!" she cried. "He look for Dawn."

"Dawn?"

"Yes, that white man is Dawn's father."

Although he anticipated an admission quite as startling, Duke nevertheless found himself amazed at the woman's confession. He recalled his vow to Tom Allen to look out for Dawn, to transmit Tom's avowal to return for her.

"Then Dawn is white?" he said.

"Many Englishmen come to Africa," Moodsa replied cryptically. "Not all go back like you—and Tom Allen."

"Then that man," said Duke, "if he is Dawn's father, is your husband. Is that right?"

Moodsa turned her eyes upon him, as if to acknowledge the relationship. But before she could speak, the man returned to the room. With another shriek, Moodsa rose and rushed toward the bar room.

Upon their arrival in Mombasa, Tom and Pigeon forthwith began their search of the waterfront dives for Moodsa. It was difficult to acquire clues, since Moodsa was not known by name in any of the places, even in those where she had been employed. Along the waterfront, jungle women were merely jungle women and nothing more. Managers were shrewd enough to suppose that what the spendthrift sailors sought was local color, so they hired the black entertainers and permitted the patrons to call them what they wished.

The transience of the patronage also made the search difficult. Nobody paused in port long enough to establish any enduring relationship with Moodsa. In one place, a four bar room which served as a refuge for pickpockets and assorted thugs, they met one of Moodsa's employers.

"Yes," he said, "I know who you mean. A big woman that thought she owned the earth. She was always bragging, when she was drunk, about her daughter being a goddess."

"That's the one," said Tom eagerly. "Moodsa, wasn't that her name?"

"Search me," returned the man indifferently. "They're all just blacky to me."

"Where did she go?" Tom asked.

"I don't know. She got kind of nutty around here, always yelling about ghosts. I threw her out. I hated to do it, because she was a good performer. She's probably got a job in one of the places around the harbor."

But after visiting several places Tom began to despair of finding the black woman. He feared that, weary of Mombasa and of working in those disreputable bar rooms, Moodsa had progressed to another place, perhaps to another jungle settlement. Pigeon, who had acquired a headache and a bad temper from the wretched liquor and foul air, urged Tom to appeal to the police.

"Now," Tom disapproved, "this is war time and there would be a lot of bother about establishing her identity, and such matters. We must not forget that our time is brief. We must find her ourselves."

Meantime, Moodsa, her courage restored by steady devotion to the bottle, was losing her fear of the forlorn little man. Duke remained at the place, drinking floods of porter and hoping for some development. After admitting that the stranger was the father of Dawn, Moodsa had stayed in the bar room avoiding Duke. However, it was part of her job to circulate among the patrons, and eventually she returned to Duke's table. The father of Dawn still sat where she had left him.

She seated herself opposite Duke, placing the bottle of liquor before her. She poured herself a generous drink and consumed it in a gulp. Duke perceived that she was quite drunk. He was relieved, for he knew her condition would prevent any further hysteria.

The old man also appeared to have been waiting for her. Observing that she had returned, he rose and crossed to her, his eyes again fixed on her accusingly.

"Your eyes are black," he said to Moodsa, "but the eyes of her mother were blue."

"You'll never see your daughter again," rejoined Moodsa with the bluntness born of drunkenness. "No white man ever see her." She laughed and poured herself another drink.

THE SWEDISH SYSTEM

To the Editor of the Public Ledger: Sir—Bishop R. J. Wade has just returned to this country after a stay of several years in the area under his jurisdiction, which includes Norway, Sweden, Latvia, Estonia, Finland and two conferences in Russia. On Friday of last week he addressed the Central Pennsylvania Conference, in session at Harrisburg. Among other things, he said:

When I landed in New York I was quite surprised to read a newspaper headline, "du Pont Praises Swedish System of Liquor Control." Probably Mr. du Pont never was in Sweden. I was in a five-minute walk one evening in Stockholm, from our hotel to the church where I was to preach, we encountered five drunken men, and twice my wife was compelled to step into the street to avoid a collision. Bishop Wade is of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Mother and Child Killed In Lincoln Highway Accident

William Adkins, of Princess Anne, driver of the truck on which Webster was employed as a helper, received minor injuries. He was treated at St. Francis Hospital, Trenton, N. J.

Edward Rock, of New Brunswick, was driving toward Philadelphia when his truck stopped east of South Langhorne. Rock crawled beneath the machine to try to locate the trouble when Adkins came along the highway in the same direction.

Rock told the State Highway Patrol that he saw the headlights of the approaching car and rolled himself from beneath the truck to the side of the road before the crash occurred. Webster was placed in a passing car and taken to the hospital, where he died without regaining consciousness.

Adkins and Rock were arrested on a technical charge of manslaughter by highway patrolmen. They were arraigned before Justice of the Peace John H. Alvey at Woodbourne, and held under $2,000 bail each.

Young Webster was the son of Frederick Webster, Sr., a well-known funeral director of Maryland. Besides his father he is survived by his mother and one sister. The body was forwarded to the Webster home last night.

A Philadelphia woman was seriously injured and her husband also hurt, early this morning, when the automobile in which they were passengers was struck by a truck in Bensalem Township.

The injured: Mrs. Nellie Cawisza, 3433 Almond street, Kensington, Philadelphia, punctured lung in which four stitches were taken, fracture between fourth and fifth rib, contusions of chest, face, hands, contused wound of forehead requiring four stitches.

Mr. and Mrs. Cawisza with their child were seated upon the rear seat of a sedan driven by Geasil Paluszek, 3263 Pehansam street, Philadelphia. They had been visiting in Hulmeville, and shortly after midnight started for their homes.

While enroute on Hulmeville Road through Bensalem Township a collision occurred between the Paluszek car and a truck operated by B. Rut-ecki. Mr. and Mrs. Cawisza were thrown from the machine.

The couple was brought to the Harriman Hospital by the driver of the car in which they were occupants. The two are still at the institution. None of the other occupants of the machines were hurt.

In a statesman it's Vision

in a cigarette it's Taste

FORESIGHT—an essential of statesmanship and of good cigarette-making too.

KNOWING WHAT SMOKERS WANT—and giving it to them in fullest measure—that's the sound basis on which Chesterfield's popularity has been built.

GOOD TOBACCOS, accurately blended—cigarettes of uniformly good quality and satisfying taste; no wonder that every day sees more and more smokers changing to this skilful blend of quality tobaccos ... for mildness and for better taste.

We state it as our honest belief that the tobaccos used in Chesterfield cigarettes are of finer quality and hence of better taste than in any other cigarette at the price. LIGGETT & MYERS TOBACCO CO.
